Class of 1974

The Class Officer Association Executive Board and Dartmouth recognize the Class of 1974 for its exemplary work in creating and developing its Health Equity Project. Established as classmates noticed and grieved the disproportionate passing of Black members of the 1974 community (at 2.3 times the rate of white classmates), the project brings awareness to the increased Black mortality related to racism and other systemic factors. Working with a Dartmouth professor and student team, the Class of 1974 also produced and released a film, "Too Many Too Soon," to call attention to this important topic and to advocate for change. The Class also has formalized plans to raise funds to support a health equity project at the College.
